

always look forward to watching the Olympic Games when they come around every fourth August. In America, they have the added bonus of distracting us from the marathon misery that we have made of the Presidential campaigns. The Olympics are not without their critics. The host nations make massive public investments only to be left with costly sporting venues that go mostly unused once the games are over. Then, there is the corruption of the Olympic committee and this year the state-sponsored doping scandal in Russia.

Not all sports fans love the games. One broadcaster said, "Olympics are for geeks." We get to watch games most of us played as kids: volleyball, swimming, biking, tennis, golf, ping pong, archery, and even sailing. Unlike the professional athletes that compete in some events, most Olympic athletes have their moment on the world stage and then go back to real life. Some try to sustain themselves during the four years between games by appearing on "Dancing with the Stars." Most Olympians cherish the memories and put their energy and discipline into their careers or families.

Women's gymnastics and swimming are the most watched events by America audiences. This year's women's gymnastics team crushed the field and won the team Gold medal. They will undoubtedly earn several more individual metals by the time this arrives in the mail or on your screen. This is the final team coached by the legendary Martha Károlyi. The breakout star of this amazing team is Simone Biles. Even to casual viewers, Biles simply performs at a higher level than anyone else.

While the young women are waiting to perform, the television camera often shows the parents agonizing during the performances and celebrating when their kids win. Since Biles is such a star the cameras often focused on her parents, Ron and Nellie Biles. So far so good, until Al Trautwig, NBC's gymnastics announcer for the Rio games, tweeted "They may be mom and dad but they are NOT her parents." It is sad that some people still don't consider parents that adopt children as their real parents.

When Simone Biles speaks of her mother and father who raised her, people recognize that they seem like lovely people who have supported her career from the beginning. The type of people who drive any matter of distances at the crack of dawn to get their daughter to practices. The kind of people who make the financial sacrifices so their child can fulfill her dream of becoming a gymnast. People who rush to the emergency room following an injury and work long hours helping their child keep up with school while maintaining their rigorous training schedules. That's what parents do.

It is alarming to me to see Simone forced to answer reporters that while Ron and Nellie are biologically her grandparents, they are truly her mother and father. For some reason, reporters insist on reminding Simone that her mother's name is Shanon. Ever the diplomat, she kindly corrects the error and clarifies that while Shanon is biologically her mother, Nellie is mom.

In a world that embraces the notion that it takes a village to raise a child, why is it so difficult for people to understand Simone's family and other families with adopted children? Adoption is not a rare occurrence. Moses, the man who God used to bring Israel out of slavery in Egypt, was raised by others who weren't his biological parents. Each year in the United States, about 135,000 children are adopted.

Annapolis writer Jenn Morson, who was adopted as a three-year-old when her biological mother died, suggested in a Sports Illustrated blog, that Mr. Trautwig and all of those who see her family, or see Simone Biles's family, and instead of seeing love see only technicalities, to look again. "Ask yourself," Morson writes, "what tethers you to your own parents or to your own children? Is it a shared recessive gene that caused you to both have green eyes? Do you immediately think of the fact that you are both blood type B negative? Rather, isn't it the time your heart was shattered and your father hugged you tightly and let you cry on his shoulder? Isn't it the moment you let go of the back of the bicycle and your daughter soared away from you, squealing with delight because you gave her the confidence she needed? That is what makes us parents. What makes us sons and daughters. That is what makes us real."

Welcome Home Patti Cable!

As most of you know, Patti Cable underwent a triple bypass surgery. We are happy to report that Patti is doing well and is back home! Currently, her parents will be staying with the family for the next week or so. Once her parents leave, the family could use some help with meals and transportation.

We will be using www.caringbridge.org for anyone who would like to help the Cable family. All you have to do is go to the website, create a free account, and put in the search bar "Patricia Cable." If you sign up for notifications, you will receive emails when a request for food or transportation is needed and all of the details for that request. You will also be able to keep up with Patti's progress.

If you have any questions, please feel free to contact Deb Cooper at 301-262-2748 or deborahkcooper@verizon.net or Dawn Wampler at 301-809-9414 or needleworkjunkie@gmail.com.

Thank You!

Dear friends,

We are appreciative of the support we have received from our many longtime friends in our Church Family. The multitude of cards, E-mails and phone calls we have received are too numerous to respond to individually so we decided to use The Caller to express our thanks. The get-well cards were especially appreciated, not only were the printed messages great but most cards had hand written notes expressing the sender's prayers for Ken's recovery. We strongly believe in the power of prayer as it relates to the healing process. He is struggling to regain his pre-surgery weight, but we have been assured this will happen eventually. Our goal is still to return to Florida for the winter season.

Our blessings to you all!
